"GATEWAY TO THE ATCHAFALAYA WILDERNESS AREA"

A LITTLE ATCHAFALAYA BASIN HISTORY

Louisiana's famous Atchafalaya Basin is the nation's largest river swamp. The word Atchafalaya is derived from the Choctaw "hacha falaia," meaning "long river." It contains over 800,000 acres of our nation's most significant bottomland hardwoods, swamps, bayous, and backwater lakes. The swamp is a natural paradise that attracts hunters, fishermen, nature enthusiasts, boaters, and tourists wanting to capture it's beauty and the intrigue of wildlife lurking beneath its surface.

The basin is about twenty miles in width and one hundred fifty miles in length, spanned by levees, and an elevated section of I-10 that is among the nation's longest bridges. During major floods, the region serves as a crucial containment area for high water.

Some fishermen and trappers still rely on the bounty of the basin for their livelihood. It is home to over three hundred species of birds, as well as crawfish, crabs, shrimp, frogs, nutria, snakes, beavers, raccoons, foxes, alligators, and black bears.
